Invites You to Attend a Congressional Briefing Titled:

“Homelessness and the Economic Crisis”

In recent years, leading communities have substantially reduced the numbers of people who are homeless by creating focused efforts to reduce and ultimately end homelessness. National experts fear the economic crisis could reverse these efforts. Research suggests that, without effective interventions, 1.5 million additional people are likely to become homeless over the next two years.

This briefing will educate Members of Congress and their staffs on progress made toward ending homelessness, proven interventions, and the federal investment needed to prevent and end homelessness within the context of the recession.
